A Practical Introduction to Teaching and Learning

By Paul Rogers

Foundations of Teaching Practice

This course is designed for people considering a career in teaching, as well as for newly qualified teachers and educators seeking a practical introduction to teaching and learning.

Introduction

It's one thing to imagine being a teacher and quite another to face a class of learners. Before embarking on an expensive training programme requiring serious commitments of time and effort, it is a good idea to see if you really have the motivation and interest to become a teacher in the first place.

That's what this short course is all about.

Over five, carefully developed units, I give you insight into what it means to be a full time, professional teacher. You may already have some teaching experience, in which case, that should be very helpful. Even if you don't, however, everyone has knowledge of teaching, as a consumer, rather than as a provider – we have all been to school and we remember the individuals who made an impression on us (positively or otherwise).

If you think teaching is a possible career path for you but would like to know more about the nuts and bolts of it all, this course may help you make up your mind.
